Version 3.2.0.7 is, in a sense, the final version of the multi-year project. But as Google warns in its blog post on the subject, this isn't a version that you can take advantage of right now. In fact, the only users who are currently seeing the new Gmail interface are those that have opted-in to the new features. This will be the last time that they're tested on a very small number of users before the new design hits the web. The first rollout is expected in the next few weeks. Here's what the blog post says: This is the last update to the Gmail design. Starting in a few weeks, we'll start a series of large-scale, gradual rollouts that will bring a big redesign to all Gmail users. You'll notice it when you start your next Gmail login, so make sure you check your inbox from a different device soon. We'll have more details on what's being done in the next few weeks as it happens. Dendritic cell-based vaccine therapy of multiple myeloma. Multiple myeloma (MM) is a disease of uncontrolled proliferation of clonal plasma cells which results in bone destruction and the release of cytokines that can cause significant organ dysfunction. Therapeutic options for MM
